A nationwide school health survey done in Egypt in 2023 gathered data from 450 teenagers aged between 14 and 17, drawn from both urban and rural schools across five governorates. The study aimed to identify the primary sources of stress among teenagers and to examine the coping strategies they most commonly adopted. Its findings show a complex picture of modern teenage life, in which academic pressure, digital habits, and social expectations interact in ways that are often difficult to separate.

The most significant finding was that 68% of participants reported experiencing moderate to high levels of stress during examination periods. When asked to identify the main causes, students ranked academic pressure first (cited by 82% of respondents), followed by social media comparison (61%), insufficient sleep (57%), and family expectations (49%). Clearly, the study found that teenagers who did regular physical activity — defined as at least 30 minutes of exercise four or more times per week — reported stress levels that were, on average, 34% lower than those of their sedentary peers, even after controlling for academic performance variables.

Cultural background also was a significant factor in how teenagers managed stress. Students from families with strong collectivist values were considerably more likely to seek emotional support from parents or siblings when facing difficulties. In contrast, students from more individualistic household environments tended to rely on individual coping strategies such as listening to music, exercising alone, or spending time in nature. Neither approach was found to be universally more effective; rather, the study suggested that the availability and quality of support networks were the decisive variables.

The researchers also noted a significant gap in access to school counseling services between urban and rural institutions. While 74% of urban schools in the sample offered some form of counseling, the figure dropped to 31% in rural schools. The study concluded that targeted mental health support programs in schools could meaningfully reduce stress levels among teenagers.

3 Read the following text, then find the word or phrase in the text that is an antonym of the words below.

Many modern families are group-oriented, where everyone shares decisions together. In such homes, an insignificant disagreement never destroys their strong bond. On the other hand, some individualistic people still prefer to handle their problems alone. They usually leave countryside-based areas to look for better job opportunities. Eventually, they choose to build their new lives in urban centers.

I Answer these questions :EXPLAIN

According to the study, what percentage of teenagers reported high stress during exams?
What were the four main causes?

ANALYZE

What specific finding links physical activity to stress levels? What does “controlling for academic performance variables” mean?

EVALUATE

How did collectivist and individualistic students differ in their coping strategies? Which approach was more effective in your opinion?

ANALYZE

What difference did researchers find in access to school counseling? What type of further research did they call for, and why?

2 Read the personal profile, then answer the questions.

THE POST

At weekends, I help at my aunt's flower shop and spend long hours standing. If my shoulders feel tense, I take a ten-minute walk along the river or stretch by an open window. When I drink enough water, I stay focused while arranging flowers. I do not follow the same plan every day, but these habits usually help me notice when I need rest rather than more phone time.

Identify two habits the writer uses to support well-being. Explain how one of them may help.

Which habit is most likely to help the writer immediately after a long period of standing? Give evidence from the profile.
